

Editor's Preface

Diversity is one of the greatest values of contemporary society. It includes, among other things, the acceptance of LGBT+ people, respect for different cultures, and active opposition to discrimination based on gender, race, or religion. Every person, regardless of sexual orientation, gender identity, origin, or traditions and beliefs, deserves equal treatment, safety, and the opportunity to be themselves and to express their uniqueness and “otherness.”

Respect for cultural diversity allows people to better understand one another, learn from each other, and build a society based on dialogue and openness—one in which there is no place for harmful stereotypes and prejudices. Counteracting gender and racial discrimination—in the workplace, education, and everyday life—is a step toward justice and equal opportunities and rights for all. Openness, empathy, and the prevention of exclusion make the world more inclusive. One of the aims of the magazine is to promote this inclusivity, and the texts it contains address issues related to diversity that are extremely important today. They can undoubtedly serve as a stimulus for reflection and social change toward greater openness, equality, and the integration of diverse social groups.

Anna Sobczak